

Hirelings

Where they'll go

Hirelings of any kind, including men-at-arms, will never venture into a dungeon¹⁾ of Dungeon Level 4 challenge or higher.²⁾ This is a game mechanic similar to a paladin's alignment restrictions; there will be no “tricking” hirelings, they simply won't go in.

Dungeon use

Hirelings will venture into dungeons and dungeon-like areas if they are paid the daily “hazardous duty” wage.³⁾ The above rule regarding Dungeon Level 4 applies.

Alignment

When the DM doesn't know the alignment of men-at-arms, it's recommended to use the following table from the Heroic Legendarium, which we feel provides for a good spread of alignments for mercenary-types:^{Ex}

d20	Alignment
1	LG
2	NG
3-4	CG
5-8	LN
9-12	NN
13-14	CN
15-17	LE
18-19	NE
20	CE

If the DM feels this is too far from the official books, the alignment table on DMG 100 can be used instead.

Furthermore, an override die can be applied to enact a 2-in-6 chance to override the rolled alignment with the typical alignment of the settlement. Thereby, a settlement which tends for example lawful evil will have a higher proportion of mercenaries of that alignment.

Prospective employers may get a feeling for alignment but will not be sure without magic.

Men-at-arms

Hiring

The nature of hiring men-at-arms will be specific to the milieu. If no other process is defined by the DM, the following can be used:^{Ex}

PCs can discover what men-at-arms are available in a settlement on a given week by spending d3 hours in a tavern.⁴⁾ The following table lists the number of rolls which are to be made on the DMG 30 table.

Settlement Size	Weekly Men-at-Arms Rolls
Thorpe	25% chance for 1 roll. Maximum of d3 individuals.
Hamlet	50% chance for 1 roll. Maximum of d3+2 individuals.
Village	1 roll.
Town	2 rolls.
City	3 rolls.

Remember that men-at-arms in groups larger than 5 will include a serjeant as one of their numbers.⁵⁾ Larger groups will have lieutenants and captains as well. All three of these officers are more expensive than regular troops⁶⁾, and the cost can rapidly add up when paying the daily hazardous duty wage.

Equipment

Men-at-arms who are hired for daily duty (i.e. when the monthly rate is instead paid daily), the men-at-arms will be mercenaries who already have their own equipment. Men-at-arms who are hired at the monthly rate will require housing, food, and equipment to be supplied by the employer. In effect, there are two types then: for-hire mercenaries, and long-term soldiers.^{Ex}

The DM will need to declare the loadouts of hired men-at-arms who are hired on a daily basis. DMG 16 is a great page for this. We typically assign one of these loadouts to all men-at-arms in a group. In cases where multiple loadouts are listed, such as heavy infantry, we roll randomly. It is recommended that the DM add variation in weapons and armor from time-to-time.

Command control

We have adopted the command control system from OD&D.^{Ex7)}

- 0-level men-at-arms will move toward an objective other than obvious loot only when a leader-type is able to exercise command control.
- Any fighter-class character (or subclass thereof) can act as a leader-type.⁸⁾
- The range of command control is the leader's charisma score in inches.
 - This range is increased by 1" for each 10' higher a leader is above the troops, as long as the leader is in plain view, e.g. on a castle wall.
 - This range is halved if the leader is in melee.
- Personnel beyond the range of command control will not respond to commands from leaders.
- Personnel engaged in melee will only respond to commands on a d6 roll of 1-4. This can be checked each round. Roll for each unit of troops, rather than each individual troop.

- Monsters, animals, and barbaric warriors such as berserkers and cavemen do not suffer from a lack of command control.

Failure to return

When characters hire hirelings and a lot of them die, hirelings will be less enthusiastic about employment with those characters.

If characters employed a group of hirelings from a settlement out of whom half or more failed to return from an expedition in the last 3 months, any group of hirelings at that settlement will require a positive reaction roll from the prospective employer. Failure indicates that group of hirelings reject employment. Any who do accept will demand double pay.

1)

... or cavern, cave, pit, whatever.

2)

Based on DMG 175. DM Note: This is a good way to allow men-at-arms for lower level adventures, but get them out of the way (except for overland travel) when characters become more capable and begin to have henchmen. DMG 175 is the only clear place in the rules that defines a line for where men-at-arms can be brought.

3)

DMG 34 contains the "Daily Employment" rule.

4)

The by-week period assumes an active area of adventurers and/or battles to be fought. The rate may be reduced to biweekly, monthly, or even rarer depending on the region.

5)

DMG 30, "If more than 5 are encountered, 1 will be a serjeant (a leader-type, or equivalent of a non-commissioned officer)."

6)

See their book descriptions following the DMG 30 chart.

7)

OD&D Vol. 3, pg. 31-32.

8)

Remember that men-at-arms hired in a group of 5 or more must include with a leader-type, who must be paid (DMG 30).
